Predictive maintenance (PM) is the use of computerized control and sensor technologies to monitor machinery in order to predict which components need replacing before the failure of others. This is done in a "premium on quality" manner in which each component is monitored using sensors. This monitoring is, in turn, linked to the database, which contains information on each component, and is used to create a prediction of which components need replacing at which time. This information can then be provided back to the machine and automated warning or maintenance systems can be notified. PM is a must for cyclical and zero downtime manufacturing systems; it cannot be used in zero downtime systems. PM in manufacturing and commercial/industrial industry Ensuring that machinery is monitored to ensure predictability is a vitally important role in the manufacturing industry. Without failure prediction and replacement, machinery and product quality cannot be assured and product delivery schedule cannot be guaranteed. Predictive maintenance for the wider use of the prediction and automation of the technical processes and managing the operational reliability of the machines; is also essential. The Factory of the Future, the Melbourne Telescope and other examples of automated factories, have a considerable development and application of PM. The ATMOS Factory, in Switzerland, is another example of a PM applied factory. Predictive maintenance is used to build predictive maintenance systems. There are many recent and current examples of PM in manufacturing industry, where it has been widely proven. Factories and processes One of the most successful examples of PM is the Sydney Telescope at Mount Stromlo Observatory in Australia which replaced 24 telescopes of identical design with an automated telescope system. PM and the automation of manufacturing processes "Classical" engineering approaches for control and maintenance problems do not use the full potential of computing, nor of reliable sensors, nor the fusion of the two to improve on
