Curcumin is a natural phenol that shows therapeutic effects in several diseases, and has therefore been widely investigated. Because it has low aqueous solubility, it has been difficult to quantify. In this work, a LC-MS method was developed for the determination of curcumin in biological samples and pharmaceutical products. The method consists of a simple liquid-liquid extraction, followed by reversed-phase chromatography in gradient mode. The mobile phase was methanol and water at a pH of 4.2 with formic acid. Good recovery values were obtained in samples of human, dog and chicken plasma (94%), milk (99%) and eggs (100%). The method has acceptable repeatability (RSD 9%) and good selectivity for the detection of curcumin. The linearity range for curcumin was from 2 to 75 μM in human plasma, milk and eggs. The method was successfully applied to the determination of curcumin in commercial samples.Anhöriga reagerade starkt när Sverige vann VM-guldet mot Frankrike i Svanorna i Göteborg.
