The Framingham Heart Study, one of the most influential research studies in history, revealed the link between high cholesterol and heart attacks. The process of discovery in science is a key driver of how we do business. The process of learning something is inherently adaptable. As a result, discovery continues to evolve into ever more sophisticated models. A few years ago, I worked with a business which was asked to do an analytics project for an automotive manufacturer. They had a bespoke analysis to do. The analysis involved making sense of a large amount of data collected by the car. However, the data used included only parts of the database. In this situation, the analysis can be viewed as a discovery process. While a bespoke analytics project can be complex, it is not unknown for data analysis to involve significant discovery activity. The data analytics project is not only about gaining the results; it is also about obtaining a data environment that enables discovery. In a more recent example, a client wanted to see if their employee retention strategy was working. They had a good idea of how to define success, but they were uncertain about how to measure it. They asked me to run a data analysis. I did a discovery process to help the client gain insights into the situation and the people involved. It was a huge success. A year later I was hired to work on the same task, which was being reassigned to a new team because of budget constraints. This was my chance to revisit my initial data analysis and discover some new insights that helped the client make the best decision. Technology is now placing the ability to search information at the fingertips of anyone. Being the first to recognise an opportunity is the key to entering the game. From the client side, it is vital to understand the situation and the people involved. From the contractor's point of view, it is important to plan for the future. Delivering a plan that is clear, specific and actionable is key. 3da54e8ca3
