The anterolateral thigh (ALT) flap has been used in reconstructive surgery for 20 years. It is one of the most commonly used flaps in the reconstruction of difficult defects. Different types of flaps based on the iliac vessels have been devised to increase the versatility of this flap. This study compares the anatomic characteristics of various flaps that are used and provides a comprehensive guide to surgeons planning on using them. The muscular and musculocutaneous pedicles are defined and subtypes of the ALT flap described. The relationship of these flaps to the skin island size, flap length, and final aesthetic and functional outcome is analyzed. Finally, the authors propose a modification of the widely used ALT flap to include the perforator-based flaps based on the lateral circumflex femoral artery.

Q: Dynamic style assignment by path Does anyone know a way to dynamically assign a CSS style for a class/id attribute by path name? As an example, given a path "mypath" and a CSS class "myClass", I would like to be able to dynamically say "Give me a class called myClass that has a style that is applied to an element with a class called myPath." Is this possible? A: You can use jQuery to set a CSS class on an HTML element, but it won't know to look for another style sheet. If you want to grab a style in a
