This is pubmed literature review of the current literature on buspirone's effects on naloxone-precipitated withdrawal, withdrawal depression and sexual behavior in male and female rats. The aim of the current literature review is to gather data on the effects of buspirone on opioid withdrawal in male and female rats. Searches for the past 3 years on Pubmed, Ovid, Embase, ODS, and Google Scholar were conducted for the search term buspirone and the search results were divided into male and female. All the articles found to be of interest were screened and divided into three groups: (1) the effects of buspirone on naloxone-precipitated withdrawal in male and female rats, (2) the effects of buspirone on opioid withdrawal depression, and (3) the effects of buspirone on sexual behavior in male and female rats. Results of the search will be discussed in regard to the current literature, future directions for research, and applications for clinical use. In the interim, we encourage clinicians to prescribe an anxiolytic for their patients being medically managed for opioid abuse. The human right to choose whether to be a parent has been enshrined in the Convention on the Elimination of all forms of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW). . The provisions of CEDAW relating to the empowerment of women have been widely ratified by all of the members of the United Nations but in several countries the result has been more. The recommendations of the Expert Consultation held by the United Nations within the framework of the General Assembly in October. . The interpretations of the Commission of Human Rights and the reports of the Working Group on Discrimination against Women on the CEDAW provisions in particular have, in addition to the views of the members of the United Nations. In most countries child marriage is the most common form of female discrimination which constitutes a breach of the Convention. . The recommendations of the Expert Consultation held by the United Nations within the framework of the General Assembly in October. . The interpretations of the Commission of Human Rights and the reports of the Working Group on Discrimination against Women on the CEDAW provisions in particular have, in addition to the views of the members of the United Nations. In the majority of countries child marriage is the most common form of female discrimination which constitutes a breach of the Convention. . The definitions of forms of discrimination are not, however, well defined and the nomenclature is not always consistent. In some cases different terms may be applied to similar practices, but in other cases the terms used appear to have different meanings. Further understanding of the nomenclature used may be of use in the designation of forms of discrimination more systematically. . Despite the seriousness of the problem of discrimination against women the strategies adopted to combat this form of discrimination still seem to be ad hoc. It is true that article 5(4) of the Convention requires all States parties to take all appropriate measures to eliminate discrimination against women and to promote equality between men and women, but in many respects the measures taken have consisted of a series of isolated measures which often fail to produce the desired effect. These measures sometimes have been taken in isolation from and not related to the rest of the Convention. As a result the term "discrimination" has been used in the context of a rather general discussion of improving the status of women in society.. Ad hoc solutions have been sought to resolve problems in particular areas, such as the employment of women or violence against women, but these have often been piecemeal and have had no effect on the overall situation. . It is the opinion of the Working Group that in many d0c515b9f4
