What's new:

Mesozoica () is the second of the three major divisions of the Paleozoic, the other two being the Paleozoic era and Precambrian. It was originally used by Pierre Jean François Lartet and then by Georges Cuvier as a subdivision in 1795. The Mesozoic is defined as the periods in the Paleozoic era following the Late Permian extinction event, and only includes the Triassic and Jurassic periods. The Mesozoic is subdivided into three eras: the Triassic period (which started with the Permian-Triassic extinction event), the Jurassic period, and the Cretaceous period (which ended with the K-T extinction event). Between these three periods is the Cenozoic era. During the Mesozoic, fauna began to overlap and compete with that of the subsequent Cenozoic era. Mesozoic dinosaurs evolved into different forms, many of which are regarded as some of the ancestors of most modern vertebrates, including birds. Non-avian dinosaurs would evolve over the ensuing Mesozoic, gradually gaining in abundance and diversity. The dinosaurs would reach their apex during the Cretaceous, with many species adapting fast enough to survive the (unknown) cause of the K-T mass extinction. The Cretaceous is also the only era in the Mesozoic where the fossil record is considered complete, with the onset of the Cenozoic coinciding with the late Cretaceous-Paleogene extinction event that occurred approximately 66 million years ago. The Mesozoic is the only major division of the Paleozoic being shared with the Cenozoic. It is the only period of the Paleozoic not transitional between the Paleozoic era and the Cenozoic era, and is the duration between the end of the Paleozoic era and the beginning of the Cenozoic era. It also encompasses the most significant evolutionary events of the Chordate subphylum, which includes all animals that have a notochord, and it was the last time that living organisms have the same environment and evolutionary pressures to adapt as in the Triassic. It was also the longest period of time in which the Paleozoic era was exposed to a seasonal climate—that of the equatorial region—which is reflected in the fossil record. Definition When Pierre Jean François Lartet first used the term Mesozoica, he employed a quantitative definition of the time
