Chemical Oils have been applied in cosmetic and therapeutic products for their moisturizing, cleansing, conditioning, and other attributes for centuries. With the advent of modern science and technology, new chemical formulations have been developed to provide solutions for the various problems and challenges faced by the end user. For example, advances in technology have produced a vast range of skin care products ranging from gentle cleansers and moisturizers to “aggressive” exfoliants. Many of these products have provided targeted delivery of various active ingredients in order to provide efficacious cosmetic and therapeutic formulations. Despite the great advances in science and technology, there remains a need to provide improved active ingredients and formulations that allow for targeted delivery of active ingredients to specific skin types and conditions. For example, it would be advantageous to have a cosmetic or therapeutic composition that targets skin conditions such as acne, which may or may not be redness based. It would be additionally advantageous to have a formulation that delivers skin lightening agents to provide for the appearance of improved skin, such as to provide evenness and/or lightening of skin tone. The disclosure provides embodiments that meet these and other needs and/or objectives.

Myointimal hyperplasia in the systemic vasculature: a prospective imaging study of balloon angioplasty. The formation of myointimal hyperplasia following vascular balloon angioplasty (PTCA) of femoropopliteal arteries and the subsequent patency of the resultant lesion were studied in 16 patients in whom Doppler ultrasound and angiography were repeated at 3, 6, and 12 months. Nine of the 16 patients required a second PTCA procedure at 6 months. Although myointimal hyperplasia is clearly associated with PTCA of the femoropopliteal system, the PTCA procedure itself does not produce further lesion formation in the majority of patients. This may indicate a reparative process to maintain vessel patency in the majority of cases.
